You might be aware of how important online reviews are, but did you know online reviews can change 67.7% of purchasing choices?

Some companies have been in the practice of hiring a third party to write positive reviews for payment. This might be alarming to you (or not), but are fake reviews illegal?

Each site that accepts online reviews has its own business practices and rules.

Google, one of the top sites for reviews, says that it's against their terms of service to pay for reviews. They refer to this as a conflict of interest.

Additionally, to protect the value of their own site, they believe reviews are most valuable when they're genuine and not biased. Yelp and Angie's List have similar policies. Yelp is also requesting business owners don't request reviews at all (even from actual customers).

Google could delete your review or remove your business listing altogether.

Also, if a customer is angry with your business and they suspect your reviews are fake, they may call this out in a negative review. All this means losing your customers' trust and credibility. Recovering from a damaged reputation is a difficult task for a business to take on.

Alternatives to Paying for Reviews

Engaging with negative reviews can be equally beneficial. It will give you the opportunity to invite the customer to return or for you to resolve their issue. Have a professional tone and approach to these responses to continue to reflect your business in the best light.
